To evaluate the efficacy and safety of adalimumab (Humira) in treatment-naïve patients with active noninfectious uveitis. Three open-label extension studies. Patients from three extension studies in which adalimumab (40 mg every other week, n = 21; 40 mg weekly, n = 8; or 80 mg every other week, n = 43) was used as monotherapy in patients with active noninfectious uveitis (reported an inadequate response to or intolerance of conventional therapy) were analyzed. Adalimumab was added to the conventional treatment regimen of study drug in order to achieve a therapeutic response; it was discontinued if no response was observed during the next 6 months. One additional 40 mg adalimumab dose was permitted if a therapeutic response was not achieved with the initial dose. The primary endpoint was the proportion of patients who had a successful therapeutic response after 6 months of adalimumab treatment. During the 6-month period, a therapeutic response occurred in 46 of 81 patients (57.5%). A therapeutic response occurred in patients with juvenile idiopathic arthritis (JIA)-associated uveitis (6/
