I responded immediately, again telling him that just because he uses it and it is “in the air” does not make it right. I shared with him that I also have been called a “damn n—a” “knock me up” and a “sissy” by my former boyfriend, who was a white man. I asked him what he thinks of that. He said he does not think it was right of him to use it. He then told me that he in no way condones racial slurs. I told him that I knew that when he called me a “damn n—a” and “knock me up” he was making a statement about his personal experience and that he understood me and others who were “damn n—as” and “knock me ups” as well as other people of color. He said he did not “feel comfortable” using that language. He said he would make an effort to refrain from using it in the future if given a chance. I told him that was fine. I told him I understood and appreciated his attempt to refrain from using that language, however, the fact of the matter is I have been verbally abused for so long, and that language is common. His excuse that it was just “in the air” was not acceptable. I told him, as a matter of fact, I cannot even go to a convenience store or gas station in my rural area without hearing some comments that are aimed at people of color and I am certain that his kind will continue to use that language, especially if the issue of marriage equality becomes a topic of conversation. I told him “No,” it will not stop there. 3da54e8ca3
