Web Data Shark! is an extremely simple and intuitive tool that makes it easy to find email addresses on the web. The application provides you with the means to save a list of emails in a couple of clicks, and is the ideal solution to an age-old problem. A new email scam that is spreading on social media platforms makes users believe their email accounts have been compromised by criminals. The scammers are asking for money in return for an elaborate code to verify that the email is intact. Users are being asked to send money via MoneyPak which was one of the first companies to introduce prepaid credit cards to the country. The scammers are asking users to enter the code and send money to an exchange that they call I WILL CASH which was put online last month. According to cyber security experts, the code and the scammers are part of a larger scam that is seen across the globe and are targeting banks. According to Arrecon, a cyber security firm, more than 1.2 billion bank and post office accounts were targeted by the scam. In March this year, Kenyan users received message that their credit card numbers were stolen and they were being charged. I WILL CASH is a website that is not protected by Google and has been since last year. Despite the number of warnings it has received, the scammers are still active. The warnings come with warnings that the email account is being monitored by police. Says Arrecon, even though this website is not protected, the site is still able to receive and deliver messages. The scammers use the name John Holmes or an online chat service that is popular across the globe. This is the email being used to scam people.
