This invention relates to the construction of an amine oxalate for use as a reference composition in the photometric determination of the concentration of carbon dioxide, hydrogen sulfide and oxygen in a gaseous mixture. The composition formed from the acids is stable. In the present invention, it has been found that tetraboric acid reacts with several primary amines to form stable, water-soluble crystals which retain their color to a high degree of heating, indicating that they are suitable for colorimetric analyses. This reaction is not predictable in advance because the reaction products are formed instantaneously. In particular, it was found that tetraboric acid reacts with N,N-dimethylamine to form a water-soluble product which is stable to heating, but it did not react with N-phenyl-N-methylamine. In addition, the products resulting from reactions with primary amines having two other substituents on the nitrogen atom also crystallize in the form of crystals having high color intensity which are stable to heating. The amine oxalates heretofore reported contain compounds having at least three cations. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 3,013,047 describes a reference composition containing 1.0 M tetraboric acid and piperidine and U.S. Pat. No. 3,244,482 describes a reference composition containing 1.0 M tetraboric acid and piperidine and U.S. Pat. No. 3,244,482 describes a reference composition containing 1.0 M tetraboric acid and piperidine and U.S. Pat. No. 3,244,482 describes a reference compositi
