You need to remove the tags from the MP3 files that you want to convert. Pharmacokinetics and Tissue Distribution of Disulfiram after Intravenous and Oral Administration to Rats. Disulfiram (DSF) is a drug used to treat alcoholism through inhibition of the enzyme aldehyde dehydrogenase (ALDH). The aim of this study was to characterize the pharmacokinetic, tissue distribution and excretion behavior of DSF in rats. Using a new HPLC method and liquid chromatography-tandem mass spectrometry (LC-MS/MS), a rapid, simple, sensitive and reliable method was developed to quantify DSF concentrations in rat plasma, liver, brain, lung, kidney, adrenal and testicle. The pharmacokinetics was analyzed using a non-compartment model. The tissue distribution was analyzed using the tissue distribution model. The excretion rate was analyzed based on the change in plasma concentration over time. A physiologically based pharmacokinetic model, a one-compartment model, was established to describe the pharmacokinetics of DSF in rats after intravenous (1 and 5 mg/kg) and oral (5 and 10 mg/kg) administration. Data analysis showed that DSF tissue distribution was extensive in liver, lung and brain. After intravenous dosing of DSF at dose of 1 and 5 mg/kg, plasma concentrations achieved peak concentrations at 1 h, and the half-life was 1.30 and 4.13 h, respectively. DSF displayed oral bioavailability of 27.9 and 58.4% after administration of 5 and 10 mg/kg, respectively. The turnover of the elimination process was $1/\text{half-life}$, which confirmed that DSF was well absorbed from the gastrointestinal tract. The main pharmacokinetic parameters of DSF (AUC, CL_z/F , V_z/F and MRT) for each dose were dose-proportional, which suggested that intravenous and oral administration of DSF might have similar therapeutic efficacy. This study provides the basic data needed to assess the pharmacokinetics and tissue distribution of DSF in different tissues. In the late 1980s, Tom Wolfe, who had long observed the demarcations between the worlds of hard-and-fast science, and media hype, began to take a particular interest in the way that technology had altered the landscape of advertising. He coined the term “New Journalism” in 1990, and would later go on to write about media
