[CR16]), leading to the hypothesis that the development of endosteal bone may precede periosteal bone formation. Our results are consistent with this hypothesis, as we identified a large increase in OCN-immunostaining in the periosteal region of the femur at an early time point, indicating an early deposition of ECM on the bone surface. In summary, we have identified two major bone cell populations in the proximal tibial metaphysis of mice and rats, a small number of cells that express c-Fos at early time points during the day, and a large number of cells that express OCN at later time points during the day. These data are consistent with osteoblasts responsible for the formation of trabecular bone and osteocytes responsible for the deposition of ECM proteins on the bone surface. The daily pattern of these cells is maintained independently of age and sex, and regulated by light and dark entrainment. Electronic supplementary material
