The contribution of homodimerization to the stability of the glucose transporter GLUT2. The glucose transporter GLUT2 is highly expressed in the brain but may also contribute to glucose transport in other tissues. GLUT2 is a dimer of two identical subunits that localize to the cell surface and are responsible for glucose transport. We have expressed GLUT2 in COS cells as a fusion protein with enhanced green fluorescent protein (EGFP) and have shown that it functions as a glucose transporter. EGFP-GLUT2 has a half-life of approximately 15 h in COS cells. This suggests that when GLUT2 is expressed on the cell surface the transporter is not highly stable. This is confirmed by the finding that expression of EGFP-GLUT2 in mouse-brain microvessel endothelial cells results in lower uptake of [3H]2-deoxyglucose than the uptake that occurs with native brain microvessels. To find a way to increase the half-life of GLUT2 and to determine whether dimerization of the two subunits plays a role in maintaining transporter activity, we examined the effect of dimerization on the stability of GLUT2. We observed that the presence of the EGFP tag and/or expression of wild-type EGFP-GLUT2 in

COS cells resulted in the b7e8fdf5c8
