Awarded Microsoft Most Valuable Professional (MVP) for 2014, 2015 and 2016.Using history, future and the present to find focus Connecting the past and the future with the present, Jessica Mohabi is helping with new innovations in a rapidly growing field of art. Mohabi is an assistant professor in art history and the university's first African-American art curator. She has helped to develop the Blavatnik Collection at the Brooklyn Museum, and she recently curated an exhibition of installation, "Afterword: Re/moving Exhibition." As the school's lone artist-in-residence, Mohabi is exploring the relationship between art and design and the multi-faceted aspects of the creative process. She is using the alchemist's tools to create her own version of the New Alchemy, an innovative concept within a New Alchemy District. Her mission is to change and transform the art-making process through new technologies, creating "interfaces" and "algorithms" that allow the creation of art on a computer. "(Artists) have become much more interested in design," Mohabi said. "Design (has been) a very modern way to shape and form spaces and to shift your space, and we think that the computer is another way to do that." Mohabi's "Art Technology" office, located in the Hal Smith Art Building, is run through the school's Office of Arts, Education and Technology and offers grants for technology development, training and application. Recently she received a grant from the California Arts Council to explore the use of new technologies for presenting 3-D images in the art world. Using these technologies will allow Mohabi to develop her own "Algorithmic Art," a way of approaching the computer as an artist. Using touch-sensitive screens, Mohabi and her colleagues are re-defining new directions of art and the way they are represented. "My desire is to think about how the past can influence and inform what we make today in the future and what we can learn from the present," said Mohabi, who is also co-founder and chief curator for BlackAvia, a community art space at California State University, Fresno. bc9d6d6daa
