I am aware that it is common for new-age / new-religion leaders to lack charisma and followers, but I don't really get why. The idea behind New-Age/New-Religion is to embrace modern societies while still maintaining ancient traditions and customs (and nothing else). What makes a leader in a new-age/new-religion environment more or less powerful than in a conservative one? A: Many new-ages are, in fact, merely fad religions without anything resembling a theocracy. In more conservative settings, leaders will be looked to to be upstanding members of the community and/or some kind of role model for the current generation of people. In newer-age communities, leaders are often just there to generate a sense of community; they may in some cases be better organizers than any kind of real leader, as someone else has already created a community. It is likely that once you actually have a leader, then they will have a rather different set of criteria for power and prestige than in a more conservative community. Title: Elden Ring - Amazing Strategy RPG Game Reviews

A mini-rant on a game I love

Here I go. I should have chosen the above "to blog" option in my header, but did not. In fact, there's no on-page editing interface.

There's no edit button on the post. There's no way to add a link in the sidebar. The subject line can only be as long as the body text, and there's no way to turn off the stupid little tooltips and italics that show up when you hover over a link (that would be red underlined?) in the body text. Uhm. .

I am going to rant for a bit. Not about spellcheck! That's useless, since I suck at it.

No. There has always been a little voice in my head. "Stop. Stop. Stop!"

I love my little game. "A huge amount, in fact, almost to the point of addiction." "Intoxicating." But just the same I have to push that voice away. Because I see the articles on the front page of this site every single day which are not only bad, but have noise behind the description and I come away a bit anxious. I saw a lot of people posting years-old titles, and then people posting reviews six months old.
