Pulmonary vascular disease secondary to systemic hypertension is an important clinical problem. A large pulmonary vascular bed and the associated vasodilation provide an important contribution to ventilatory function and gas exchange, particularly in the setting of hypoxemia. The majority of patients with pulmonary vascular disease secondary to systemic hypertension present with hypoxemia. Pulmonary vasodilation secondary to chronic hypoxemia is an important contributing factor to the pathophysiologic process. In addition to the effects of increased pulmonary arterial pressure, pulmonary vascular bed disease may contribute to increased arterial-alveolar oxygen difference and deterioration of gas exchange. Pulmonary vasodilation and hypervolemia of the lung may also contribute to the development of noncardiac pulmonary edema in patients with severe arterial hypertension. Identification of patients with pulmonary hypertension secondary to systemic hypertension and initiation of therapy directed toward the pulmonary vascular lesions are important for decreasing the risk of hypoxemia and its associated morbidity. cell permeant, non-fluorescent derivative of N-(7-nitrobenz-2-oxa-1,3-diazol-4-yl) (NBD) -flu
