[pdf] download alberto lacerda clementino torrent With not a little irony, one group of Russian cyber-crackers have been Googling their way to hacking and ruining the lives of a small number of Americans. In the process, they've inadvertently succeeded in exposing a truth that goes to the heart of the Russian advantage in global cyber-war: they just don't care about American citizenship or what happens to individual Americans. This week, Russian hackers broke into American credit union OneWest Bank (which was later acquired by Citi) and downloaded thousands of files, including the authentication keys needed to access thousands of customer accounts. But here's the thing: the hackers chose to put American account holders first by dumping the stolen information on the open Web. Since then, Gawker, Gizmodo, and other news sources have been picking it up. And as they've plundered the accounts of even relatively obscure individuals who deal with the companies in question, the names and identifying information of more than 3,000 American credit union customers have become readily accessible, thanks to Google. Google has been kind enough to spell out the algorithm for finding some of the names and addresses of the victims online. "Try looking up Victor Cordero, who is a poet," says a redditor who's up on the latest developments in Russian hacking. "Liverpudlian slang for a homosexual. His Wikipedia page says he was a nominee for the New York State Poet Laureate in 2009." And, indeed, Google has indexed the information for anyone who's ever Googled Victor Cordero, a.k.a. "Vince." (It's also indexed his husband, Vincent Denaro, who is a contestant on American Idol, in case you wanted to Google him and thereby embarrass him.) A number of explanations for this kind of self-centered behavior can be easily sorted out: Russian hackers have more or less contempt for the fact that their victims are American or that their victims are out in the open; they're looking for new targets and this isn't that hard to do in the US; or perhaps they just don't give a damn about anyone's privacy or security. But when you consider the trove of stolen personal data that the hackers stole, it's not at all clear that they'
