H1N1 influenza vaccination is recommended for all persons aged > or =6months. Little is known about the immunogenicity of H1N1 in routine clinical practice. A cross-sectional analysis of adults receiving H1N1 influenza vaccination in a private practice setting from December 2003 to April 2004 was performed. Persons were excluded if they received a seasonal influenza vaccine > or =10 days before or after vaccination, were or =320, and 64 (41-100) for geometric mean titer (GMT). Geometric mean titers for subjects aged or =75 years were 1.2 (0.85-1.8) and 1.07 (0.9-1.3), respectively (P = 0.13, for or =75 years). Geographic location at the time of vaccination was associated with antibody response: seronegative persons in the Mid-Atlantic or Midwest regions had a geometric mean titer of 19 (95% CI, 12-30), compared with 171 (95% CI, 126-228) for those in the East

Seventy-two patients, of whom 54% had AIDS, were included. We evaluated the incidence of fungal infections, the bacterial activity of the isolates and the resistance of pathogenic germs to some antibiotics, after analysing the data of the Infectious Diseases consultation and the Toxicology Laboratory. The 47% of the patients who were infected by Candida and 19% of those with Aspergillus were treated with co-trimoxazole. In 39% of these patients with symptomatic infections, co-trimoxazole was the first therapy, but in 21% of asymptomatic patients the indication was not clear. After 3 months of treatment, there was no significant difference in the cumulative incidence of infections with the incidence of multiple candidosis or aspergillosis in relation to the different treatments, respectively. The bacterial activity of the isolates was not modified, but there was a slight variation in the sensitivity of our germs to some antibiotics, especially the aminoglycosides. When treating patients with opportunistic fungal infections, cotrimoxazole can be used, but only if the patient is well enough to be on oral treatment.Q: Trying to use "Objects" in JavaScript, getting error Im trying to use Objects but im getting an error that i cant seem to fix
