The technology is used by FIFA's player movement animations, ball physics, ball control, player and team reactions and the pitch design. "Developing "HyperMotion" for FIFA is an experience we had to make happen internally, so that we could ensure the product we deliver to you is the best possible one." said David Rutter, game director at EA Canada. "We've been closely following the movements of real-life players to make sure we incorporate the right player behaviors and use the right contact physics for player animations. We've also utilized motion capture data to help us create an authentic and engaging ball physics system." Notable additions include the player and ball interaction animations, player and ball collision system, and the ability to run with the ball and dribble - with new physics-based, player animations. As the system has been created in-house, the physical console has been converted to produce an almost perfect comparison to the real-life movement and reactions. "Bringing "HyperMotion" to FIFA has been an incredible experience," said Darren Gibbs, Senior Animator at EA Canada. "We had to create something that would be both realistic and fun, but also match the look and feel of FIFA." "The challenge was to deliver the most realistic and playable game possible. From the physical environment and the goal posts to the player path integration – we were incredibly busy creating these elements to ensure the gameplay felt and looked as close as possible to the real thing."

"The big challenge of working on a sports game is making sure the physics, player path integration and player animations feel exactly right." said Sam Gardner, animation supervisor at EA Vancouver. "We've worked closely with David, Darren and of course, the player movement and gameplay experts, but in doing so we've had to do loads of experiments to come up with the right solutions."
