hypertension on management of hypertension in primary care. The Hypertension and Psychosocial study was carried out to identify whether the perception of people suffering from hypertension that their hypertension was controlled by lifestyle changes was associated with concomitant hypertension control, and whether this was modified by their perception of the likelihood of complications and the control being set by doctors. The study population consisted of a total of 683 subjects from 9 general practices in the New-South Wales region in Australia. The study design was a cross-sectional survey in a randomized controlled trial of a hypertension self-management program. Individuals identified as hypertensive by their general practitioners (GPs) were randomized by GPs to program participation or not. Study subjects completed a questionnaire on hypertension knowledge, beliefs and treatment practices. Subjects were also asked about their beliefs about complications from hypertension and the likelihood of a doctor setting hypertension control standards.

Uncontrolled hypertension was significantly less likely to be believed to be controlled by lifestyle changes in those with perceived likelihood of complications, compared with those who believed that their hypertension was controlled by lifestyle changes. While not receiving medication was positively associated with perceived likelihood of complications, this association was not observed in those who were not diagnosed with hypertension. These findings were unaltered when age, sex and neighbourhood were controlled for in logistic regression models. It seems that control of hypertension is more likely to be perceived as controlled by lifestyle changes when individuals are less positive about hypertension complications. This is most likely because hypertension control is seen as a precaution against complications if they are perceived as a potential threat. Continuous bath application of anecdotal GABAB receptor agonist, JZL-184, enhances morphine-induced antinociception in mice. Continuous bath application of the GABAB receptor agonist, JZL-184, enhanced the time-dependent potentiation of intracerebroventricular morphine (0.2 microgram) in a tester-insensitive analgesia paradigm. JZL-184 (0.1 microgram) increased the threshold of electrical nociceptive threshold to 10.6 +/- 1.6% MPE and 44.0 +/- 4.4% MPE 60 and 120 min after application, respectively. These results suggest that continuous bath application of JZL-

Efficacy of (99m)Tc-GSA for early diagnosis of cirrhosis in chronic hepatitis C. The aim of the present study was to evaluate the efficacy of (99m)Tc-galactosyl-sulfate (GSA) for early diagnosis of cirrhosis and minimal hepatic fibrosis in patients with chronic hepatitis C. A total of 105 subjects were enrolled into the present study (43 patients with biopsy-proven cirrhosis, 42 patients with non-cirrhosis and 20 healthy controls). To estimate the efficacy of GSA, early liver uptake, half-life and clearance of GSA and their relationship to liver fibrosis were evaluated. In addition, time-activity curves of GSA in each liver segment were
