* Terrain: underground caves, atmospheric environments and populated places. *
Enemies: Namobouh, Klakaboums,

Cherouns, Mimungouh, Inoumhou, and of course fireflies, but beware, the Namobouh is outnumber them all! * Puzzles: light puzzles to investigate and solve. * Point of the Game: the adventure is to catch as many fireflies as possible! And I'm sure you've already begun to think of the spoilers : * Level Up: each level is a new mission to complete. * Hunting in a new way: drop explosives and sprays to catch the fireflies! * Ghost mode: change the difficulty and challenge yourself to find all the fireflies! * The surprise: fireflies love warmth, so beware of them close to the enemy, whether they're real or not! * The narrative: the companion of the Namobouh is a young woman, who's searching for her

"We did a lot of experimentation and development to really explore some of the different ways that you can approach an adventure game. We want to maintain the formula and give players different ways to complete it, but also be more accessible for people that maybe haven't played an adventure game before." Dark Monkey Software Creative Director, Patrick McHale

Like the original, the game requires you to explore levels, solve puzzles, and find a way to save the life of the woman you see stuck in the middle of the desert. Black Mirror II manages to retain the mystery of the original while adding in some new mechanics and the option to control your character with a Kinect-style camera. Sure, there are a few bugs and the game was a bit glitchy during the demo I played. However, the bugs mostly seemed to be non-gamebreaking and were certainly easy enough to work around. Despite the slightly choppy controls and glitchy camera, I really enjoyed my time with Black Mirror II. Sure, there were some problems that I felt could have been better addressed. However, in the end I found Black Mirror II to be an excellent game that will keep me hooked for a while to come. The Adventure Game Experience At the beginning of the game, you are given a tour of the Super 8 film lab where you meet one of the game's protagonists, an aspiring filmmaker named Edward. Edward seems to be the main character in this game and the reason why you are playing. Like the first game, the plot of Black Mirror II is a bit confusing, but I will do my best to explain it. At the beginning of the game, Edward is seeing stars and thinking about what life might have been like if he had stayed in Oregon rather than moving to London to be with his ex-girlfriend, Sophie. Edward heads to London where he runs into a woman named Elizabeth, who is being chased by an assassin, AKA the Batman. Elizabeth escapes, but during her escape, she drops a ring on the ground. She tells Edward that she had a daughter, who she was planning to leave in the care of her father, whom she never got the chance to meet, and that she is planning on retiring. She then tells Edward that she will give him the ring if he takes care of her daughter. A short time later, Edward stumbles upon a Super 8 film laboratory in the midst of a riot. The rioters say they will help Edward. As it turns out, the film lab is a front for a
