The timely intervention of the federal government as the sole catalyst for achieving a reduction of air pollution from diesel engines was first achieved in the United States by the introduction of the Air Quality Act of 1967, as amended, in 1970. Emission reductions from the motor vehicle industry were targeted by this legislation to accelerate the development and demonstrate the feasibility of more efficient and less polluting engines for motor vehicles. The result was the reduction of toxic pollutants as well as the reduction of carbon monoxide and hydrocarbon emissions from heavy-duty engines that have significantly improved the quality of air in urban areas. Studies have shown that emission controls and advanced fuel technology have also decreased nitrogen oxides by 40 to 60% by the use of selective catalytic reduction systems and particle traps in the exhaust system. The new engine technology has become a catalyst of a new
