To assess the psychosocial adaptation of the lung transplant recipients in a public hospital. Prospective, observational, descriptive study of the quality of life of lung transplant patients and other patients (control) by using the Nottingham Health Profile questionnaire. From January to December 2006, 46 patients participated in the research (lung transplant recipients: n = 20; control group: n = 26). The patients answered the questionnaire at three time points: preoperatively, at 2 and 6 months postoperatively. It was a quantitative study and the statistical analysis was performed using the software PASW Statistics. There were no statistically significant differences between the two groups in the preoperative time. Postoperative differences are statistically significant between the two groups (p

Conventional mobile computing devices, including mobile electronic devices, for example, feature high performance processors, large displays, and large amounts of memory. The large size and power requirements of such devices make it impractical for the devices to run off batteries alone. To improve battery life of the mobile electronic device, a “graceful” termination of inactivity is conventionally performed to lower device power consumption. For example, a timer is regularly used to shut off various device components. Such devices usually consume power during the operation of an application, but consume power in a low mode when the application is not running. If, for example, the device is resting on a bench while in a state that consumes power, the device can be shut down in a low power mode to reduce the total power consumed when the device is shut down. Depending on the amount of time the device is resting on the bench, the device may remain shut down for some period of time to reduce energy consumption. In some states, the device shuts itself off after some predefined time period. Upon entry to this state, the device may cause
