PlayStation 2 in 2004. The follow-up game Grand Theft Auto IV was released for the PlayStation 3 and Xbox 360 platforms. The game was the first in the series to be developed by a Japanese studio, Rockstar Tokyo. The New York Times has a piece explaining that old battery technology is holding back our “most pressing” clean energy technologies. The piece is largely about the negative effects that fossil fuel companies have had on climate change, and their efforts to prevent the United States from switching to renewable energy sources like wind and solar. One of the most important parts of the article, however, is when the Times describes the future (as of now):

Going to greater extremes, a world in 2050 that is half the size of current China would be roughly the same size as India. Its overall electricity supply would be 60 percent generated by coal and 24 percent by hydropower. By 2030, we’re talking about a world that is predominantly powered by coal. Not clean coal, mind you — just coal. In fact, the bulk of our overall energy supply would come from a grid in which 41 percent of it is generated by nuclear power, 9
