In October 1991, the Regional Health Authority for the North East Region of England (NERE) developed a mortality-based reporting system for identifying, recording and following the health of populations in all 22 Primary Health Care Trusts (PCT) within the Region. The system covers the whole life cycle of mortality, including congenital and congenital anomalies, from initial diagnosis to death, death certification, registration and reporting in the Regional Database. The regional mortality-based system of reporting is designed to give a better picture of the mortality characteristics of the Region, such that it will be possible to monitor trends in any disease and to compare the mortality experience of the North East with that of comparable populations. The NERE project team, based at Newcastle General Hospital, developed a system for recording birth, death and vital status for the NERE and then defined mortality for the whole life cycle of mortality. A provisional mortality definition has been produced on the basis of this definition. A problem has arisen with the interpretation of the term 'premature mortality' as there are many different uses of this term with different meanings. This has arisen with the fact that different PCTs within the Region use different definitions. In this paper we discuss the problem of deciding how to define premature mortality and how this affects the definition of premature mortality used in the NERE Regional Mortality Database. We also discuss some of the implications of premature mortality for the regional system. The digital mobile phone user is more likely to suffer from an ear injury than the digital land-line phone user, according to a study from the University of Washington. The research, led by assistant research professor Thanasis Pallikaris, found that "The ear injury risk is about three times more likely for mobile phone users," and the research indicates that as the number of mobile phone users increases, the ear-injury rate tends to also increase. It found that mobile phone users who used their handset to talk less than once a week had a lower risk of ear injury, but users who used their mobile phone more often had a greater risk of ear injuries. "For a number of reasons, at-risk individuals [i.e. those who suffer from hearing problems] are more likely to use a mobile phone,"
