Eighteen percent of the 12,000 injured patients seen at the emergency department of the University Hospital, Basel from 1970-1981, and four and a half percent of the 37,525 patients treated in our trauma centre were victims of a road accident. These patients experienced an average of 10.5 pre-existing injuries which had been treated elsewhere, usually in the previous 24 h. In about ten percent of the cases we diagnosed either a concomitant injury of minor severity or a recurrent injury. Road accident injuries are difficult to classify, so that in the following the influence of the three main causes of trauma on the injury pattern is discussed: direct trauma, indirect trauma and sprain.The heterozygote state for dominant delta F508 CFTR-associated disease. The objective of this study was to determine the carrier status of potentially at-risk children (zero to six years old) and children (seven to 18 years old) with cystic fibrosis (CF). A randomly ascertained sample of patients with CF completed CF-related health surveys. All children with a principal diagnosis of CF were ascertained, irrespective of age. A total of 1,325 patients, representing 90.9% of the children registered in Manitoba Province, completed the study; 444 children, representing 41.6% of the total sample, were diagnosed with CF with two or more positive sweat chloride tests. A total of 1,909 children, representing 24.1% of the CF patients in the province, were identified as living with a CF-affected sibling
