Q: Cannot show right property of the cohttp response I'm using the cohttp. When I receive data from the server, it contains a bool value. What I try to do is to check whether the bool value is true or false. However, it does not work. I tried both cases. How to show the correct result of my request? type ServerData = { a: bool; b: string; c: int } dataHub.post( '/datashub/pass', dataHub.jsSave(true) |> mapToSignal ).mapToSignal = (boolValue: bool) => (boolValue === true)? { c: 1, b: 'hello world', a: 'ok' } : (boolValue === false)? { c: 2, b: 'bye world', a: 'ok' } : null Note: The response is Ok. The response body cannot be shown. It only contain the bool value. A: you have to call your mapToSignal like this mapToSignal({ a: true, b: 'hello world', c: 1 }) but the interesting is that you can see on type signature that you get a signal with either :T:bool, bool or T with no arguments. 1. You can read more about that here:Â· Resistance Training Resistance Exercise is a form of movement that causes a type of muscular contraction in the body. It is the opposite of anaerobic exercise (sprinting, jumping, running, throwing, etc.), which is the type of movement in which the level of oxygen is insufficient and the muscles exert all of their metabolic energy for brief periods of time. Resistance training is used to increase the strength of muscles (mostly in the lower body), while aerobic exercise is used to increase the endurance of muscles. When performing resistance exercise you will need to lift weights or use resistance bands to move your muscles. These weights or resistance bands are called resistance and the people using them are called resistance trainers. Resistance exercises are sometimes called strength training exercises. Often we hear people say they do resistance training or strength training. When a person lifts a weight the muscle they use to do the lift actually shortens. That means that when you do a squat (weighted leg lift) the muscles on the front and back of the thighs are shortened and when you do a push-up (weighted arm lift) the muscles in the back of your shoulders are shortened. Resistance training also helps muscles to become stronger. A weaker muscle is easier to fatigue than a strong one. On the other hand, aerobic exercise increases the endurance of your muscles. Over time, the endurance of your muscles will increase. Resistance training is one of the most effective ways to get stronger and improve your fitness. It is the best way to decrease the amount of fat your body contains. Many people don't realize that the muscles in your body store up fats and the longer you go without exercising the more fats your muscles hold onto. Resistance training is the single
