Synaptic transmission involves the flow of information between neurons. One of the molecules responsible for this flow is glutamate, which binds to a class of receptors on the neuron's surface and induces chemical reactions inside the neuron which eventually results in the release of other molecules that communicate that information to other cells. There are three known types of glutamate receptors. The first type is an ion channel that allows a flow of the positively charged molecules through the cell membrane. One example of this is the N-methyl-D-aspartate (NMDA) receptor. The ion flow in this case is chloride (Cl-), potassium (K+), calcium (Ca++), or sodium (Na+). The second type of glutamate receptor is a G protein-coupled receptor (GPCR) with seven transmembrane domains. This receptor binds with high affinity to glutamate and to its agonists, but not to its antagonist. The third type of glutamate receptor is a G protein-coupled receptor with only six transmembrane domains. This receptor binds only to glutamate and its antagonist. Many of these glutamate receptors are located on nerve cells. Glutamate is secreted by axons and binds to receptors on the cell bodies of neighboring neurons to stimulate or inhibit the generation of action potentials. In this way, glutamate is involved in communication between neurons. Glutamate receptors are located in the central nervous system
