locating the sinuses that might drain lymph in human lymph nodes, the arrangement of lymphatic capillary meshwork and the internal and the external circumference of the nodal capsule were studied in 90 nodes from the left brachial group (donor), fixed in formalin and prepared for histologic study. Sinuses were found in every node; the axillary nodes presented the highest frequency of 10 sinuses and had the most prominent ones. The lymphatic capillaries were arranged in a vascular meshwork with a regular pattern. A vascular plexus (which in another study was termed a network of intercommunicating vessels and in the present article a sinus) was found around the internal circumference of the lymphatic capillary meshwork. The lymphatic capillaries took the form of blind endings that penetrated directly into the sinuses. The lymphatic capillaries that were in contact with the sinuses were found on the outside of the nodal capsule. The precapillary and postcapillary venules with contiguous lymphatic capillaries were also located on the outside of the nodal capsule. In the trabecular sinuses, the average distance from the sinuses to the lymphatic capillaries was 2.1 +/- 0.2 mm. The highest number of vessels connected with the same sinus was 3 (4.3%), while the smallest number was 1 (2.2%). The contribution of the lymphatic capillaries to the interstitial fluid space was evaluated on the basis of the average distance from the lymphatic capillaries to the nodal cells. After measuring the relative distance from the lymphatic capillaries to the interstitial fluid space, the average was found to be 1.2 +/- 0.6 mm. The average number of lymphatic capillary meshes that were in contact with one nodal cell was found to be 0.0 (2.2%). The lymphatic capillaries were directly linked to interstitial fluid space, based on the average distance from the lymphatic capillaries to the interstitial fluid space. et al. [@CR23]). In the last decade the use of the bile acid sequestrants cholestyramine and
