Download (11 KB).Q: UserControl derived from a Thread constructor I have derived a custom UserControl from System.Windows.Threading.Thread to make it easier to build the functionality I need when creating threads. The reason for this is I don't have control over the thread class or how it gets created and the constructor I have in the Thread class isn't working. I am having a problem with the constructor not being called. I am using this constructor with a custom control and I am using one of its properties like in the following example. public partial class ThreadParams : UserControl { public ThreadParams() { InitializeComponent(); } public bool IsValue = false; } I am creating the thread with the following code: ThreadParams thread = new ThreadParams(); thread.IsValue = true; Thread thread = new Thread(ThreadParam.Caller, thread, null, null); thread.Start(); There are other properties added to the thread but they are not even being read because the constructor isn't ever being called. The thread param class is public and implements the abstract abstract class ThreadBase. ThreadBase.Thread is: public abstract class ThreadBase : IDisposable { public delegate void RunParam(T parameters); protected Thread thread; public ThreadThread(RunParam callParam) { thread = new Thread(callParam); thread.Start(); } public ThreadBase() {
