And Attorney General Eric Holder has promised a thorough review of the matter. But the question of what happened and who was involved is never going to be resolved, in large part because the IRS is a bureaucratic machine that is designed to shield itself from public exposure. What has been unfolding over the past three weeks is a struggle for that bureaucratic machine – the IRS – to retain its institutional power as the Constitutional “Fiscal” Branch of the Obama Administration. Yes, there are real conflicts of interest in the Internal Revenue Service. Some IRS employees are so bitter toward Tea Party groups, even as far back as 2010, that they actively sought to target conservative groups. And it took the heroic work of a few IRS whistleblowers to identify that corruption. Whether the IRS is the organization that is “devastated” by the leaking of personal emails and career officials that it sought to advance an anti-Conservative agenda is still unknown. One of the most common defenses of the IRS has been that its employees are merely acting out of misplaced loyalty to the conservative groups that were their targets. But that defense is now a lie because it was precisely those IRS employees who sought to destroy the Conservative groups that exposed the corruption. In addition to Obama’s Justice Department becoming aware of the targeting as the Inspector General’s office was preparing its report, the New York Times obtained the emails from that office showing how the IRS focused on conservative organizations during the 2012 election cycle. And the Department of Justice is now aware of what the IRS was doing. One of the other criticisms of the IRS is that it was too focused on tax-exempt status and not sufficient on the actual collection of taxes for which the organization was organized. But a detailed analysis of the Internal Revenue Service’s day-to-day operations by FreedomWorks, a group closely associated with the Conservative movement, has concluded the tax-exempt complaint process that the IRS used for political reasons was the same one that other groups use. And, in addition, the IRS was engaged in a huge number of audits involving tens of millions of dollars. The problem is that the Federal bureaucracy is set up to make these kinds of matters secret. That is because it involves detailed information about every aspect of a taxpayer. If the IRS staff are thinking about a c6a93da74d
