A desirable trait in a primary teacher is academic ability. That requires math, language, and science training as well as working with kids to help them learn. The job description above is how I used to describe my field. It's now changing, but when I began my career as a primary school teacher 14 years ago, I viewed my job description in terms of activities and skills needed for basic instruction of children and basic management of the school. For example, I might teach reading, math, science and language arts. I might teach how to manage classroom time, how to handle discipline issues, and how to organize students. This description has changed to include technology. Currently, the job description includes mathematics, writing, computer science, and digital reading instruction and learning. Of course, all subjects (including math) need to be taught and the older, including the middle school, need to be taught according to the curriculum. Much of what was considered teaching today was in the past administrative or management and certainly would not be part of the job description if I asked parents if they could find someone who would do the job. So, the job description I give now includes the instruction of the subjects, but it also includes the following: Coaching/Teaching Coaching or teaching, as well as management, includes developing a relationship of trust with students and families. It also includes support for students in the development of a relevant curriculum. Reading to
