first, we do not know exactly what the optimal size of every market should be. we know that some industries are too competitive to be controlled by one company. but the answer does not rest in the hands of government. every industry should have a range of choices in which a small business can start up and thrive. markets should be large enough to get out of the shadow, but small enough to be controlled by a mom-and-pop shop. second, we do not think the answer to monopolies is to create them – that is, to actively build new monopolies in areas of critical infrastructure, where companies raise prices and pay workers low wages. this is a bad idea because monopolies can be dangerous even in places where there is not a market. while big companies use their size to exploit the weak, they can also destroy the weak through mergers and monopolies. it would be a great disservice to the economy and to the consumers we seek to protect to deliver and create monopolies we know we cannot sustain. instead, we should be fighting to decrease the monopolies we have, especially when our current approach has not led to a good outcome. and yet, somehow, despite the bewildering rise of corporate concentration, the notion that monopolies are a threat to democracy and free markets persists. how is that possible? why do we keep falling for the same old monopolist-service trap? one reason is that they come with a warm, fuzzy image. companies such as coca-cola and google are media darlings, and, since many of us grew up watching their commercials, identifying with them feels like a natural part of our lives. they are also underdogs, fighting for a piece of an evolving, virginal market. this image is the main driver behind the oft-repeated claim that monopolies are like family businesses, playing by a code of fairness, not just self-interest. it was one of the reasons that so many progressives, including senator john kennedy in 1920, agreed with the formation of the federal trade commission in 1914. the ftcs power to police the economy came as a direct result of reforming the corporations that had played such a corrosive role in the great depression.

but the democrats could change. many democratic candidates for 2016, not only for president but also for us senate and house, back measures to break up monopolies. the kochs and others who want to keep them strong have funded new groups in an attempt to defeat democratic insurgents, and the disaffected liberal base has either joined or created alternative organizations to conduct civil disobedience against the status quo. some democrats have even begun to publicly criticize monopoly, as happened with a speech from comedian bill maher last year . in short, the democrats need a breakthrough in 2016. what they get, instead, is history. after the disaster of the great depression, the new deal created a seemingly permanent political consensus in favor of economic regulation, at least on paper. by the 1960s, business titans such as clarence m. stephenson, the ceo of gulf oil, writing for fortune, called for the government to cease regulating the economy and instead allow the capitalist system to right itself. democrats, whether on the hill or in the white house, became spineless and easily bought off by the monopolists who funded their campaigns. because of the damage done by the repeal of glass-steagall, the only way to avoid another great depression was to allow the nation to be overwhelmed by financial behemoths such as amazon and google. as stephenson put it in his essay, firms like fisker and tesla are fine to encourage, because they are owned by people who "can and do stand the exigencies of capitalism," but the economy will descend into chaos if we allow too many corporations to control the economy.
