has certainly improved over the years, but any software can only go so far. when it comes to the sony camera apps, sony itself has grown a bit lazy: not a lot of new features have been added, and they're still pretty rough around the edges. like with the xperia 5 ii, i see a lot of "naturally exposed" photos from the front-facing camera, which is nice for videos but not so great for photos. the sony camera apps are useful, if you need advanced photo features. there's scene intelligent auto, which attempts to figure out what kind of scene you're in and automatically adjusts the settings to take the best photos of that environment. unfortunately, the xperia 5 ii takes insanely grainy and oddly exposed photos. only the hdr function in the camera app functions at all on its own, and it only auto-enhances the photos. hdr is only useful for bright, sunny days, when there's no strong contrast in the photo. otherwise, the camera seems to be horribly ineffective. best of all is its new time-lapse feature, which attempts to record a series of photos in a minute or two intervals, rather than the 6-10 minutes seen on most phones. it's a neat idea, and while the final results aren't terrible, the xperia 5 ii had trouble capturing clear, crisp time-lapse images.

the stabilization feature attempts to counteract shaky hand motion by processing the video stream. it can be effective, but it doesn't always work particularly well. as a result, you're left with some really shaky time-lapse and timelapse videos, which you can fix in a couple of video editing apps that also come installed on the phone. the xperia 5 ii has google play music, youtube, and google photos, all of which have video editing tools. with its weird-quality, grainy photos and underwhelming camera software, the xperia 5 ii probably won't do much to convince anyone to jump over to the xperia line. then again, the cameras in some of the more expensive pixel phones are really impressive and actually use sony-made camera modules. the xperia 5 ii has a 5.84-inch hd+ (1,424 x 720) 2k display, and it does look sharp. colors are vivid, contrast is good, and whites are very bright. it has relatively low blue-light thresholds, too. the display glass is very thin, which can make it feel fragile but, after some use, i felt like my palms were hurting less than they do on the same-size screens on other phones. if, like me, you don't need huge text and you don't want to see the beauty of everything in the world in greyscale, you'll love this screen. in terms of connectivity, the xperia 5 ii's been built around a usb-c port that's been saddled with a whole lot of branding. it's likely there's a proprietary fast charger in there somewhere. it will charge a non-standard 18w pd charger in about an hour (four hours on the 5), but any standard charger you can buy will get you closer to the 35w you'll get on a fast charger (you'll also get a more reliable 24w charger). 5ec8ef588b
