We walked down to a small flat at the end of the street, where he had an old set of outsize wooden chair, faded sofa and a few odds and ends. He gestured towards one corner of the room, saying "Look, it's not much, but there you are." I stared at the chair and sofa, and the little table on which I assumed the room had been set out when he or his wife had occupied the flat, and tried to imagine us sitting around it, him on the sofa, his wife in the chair, me on the floor. It was all very perplexing, and in the meantime, he had produced a key from his pocket and was sitting on a wooden trunk, stacking the silver halfpennies which were on a coffee-table next to the sofa. "They're mine," he said, "I live up at another place and they've been in a bank for years." He glanced up at me, and I saw his eyes twinkle as he made a little gesture of surprise. "Is that so?" he went on, "Quite a looker." I blushed, feeling the compliment so suddenly that it quite embarrassed me. As we walked to a restaurant, he explained how he lived there, what the flat really contained and what happened to the furniture and other things when he moved.
