I am reading the following paragraph from "First things first: water" by Jessica Shizgal (Graduate thesis, University of Toronto). The third step in this process is the creation of the mythic nonpolar surface, a term that some people define as the "chemical boundary between water and air." That nonpolar surface is what we've been seeking all along, for even though the tide has been driven away, the instant it returns, the forces of attraction and repulsion compel the salt and fresh water of the nonpolar surface back to one another. What exactly is the "nonpolar surface"? A: This is a common problem with chemistry, in that it is often difficult to describe accurately with chemistry language. Chemistry tends to fall back on physics and the context can often be ambiguous. This can happen with students as well who have not learned chemistry. I know of two slightly different things that are used here: the air-water interface and the water-air interface. Both will be reasonably effective in describing what is meant here, but I can only say that my understanding is that the nonpolar surface refers to the air-water interface, and the polar surface refers to the water-air interface. There are a couple of reasons why these are the most likely candidates. Both of these are well established in the literature: the air-water interface is the boundary between air and water molecules, while the water-air interface is the boundary between water molecules and air molecules. If you imagine a slab of water, then the air-water interface is located on the surface of this slab. So the idea of being 04aeff104c
