That's all.Q: Approaches to solving an algorithm that processes a large data set I have an algorithm that processes a large data set and needs to finish with good accuracy (within the accuracy that the algorithm can achieve) within a specified time limit. The algorithm is not perfect and can make some mistakes. The difference in accuracy that is allowed from each mistake is not known. I was wondering if there are any approaches to solve this type of problem? A: This is a challenge I've faced several times, usually while debugging a solution that I already had. This sort of thing can get complicated in terms of thinking about, but in practice I've found the following three methods to work well: Redundant encoding. Decode the bit stream in a step-by-step manner, and find a way to log what the output was for any given bitstream. Write your output in a 'padded' format (e.g., base64), and then step through the input byte-by-byte, checking against the encoding's table of expected results. These all can be made simpler if you can get access to the data that the algorithm is running on, because in this case you don't need to spend time looking up the 'decoding' values; just pull the original data out of the file. The three methods above assume that you can ensure that your bitstream is unambiguous (e.g., the 1's in the example above weren't particularly well-guarded against being interpreted as the '0's). In each of these cases, you can also log the current time as you go along. A final thing that has really helped me in the past was to record the time, the number of bits that were processed, and the size of the bit stream at the start of each run, and then compare these values after the run to see if the output is within the specified requirements.
