There's been a lot of "tantrums" about how Congressional Republicans are yanking earmarks, also known as pork barrel, from their spending bill. "Ya know," writes Michael McAuliff of the New York Sun, "it is. One has to hand it to the Republitards: They sure are good at striking public works projects out of their budget bill." As the Sun goes to press, Fox News is reporting that the Rs have snarled up even the milquetoast earmark they inserted in the budget bill. And they were more than willing to sacrifice their pork before the last election to get us out of Iraq - so no reason to complain about the latest eruption in the capital's budget wars. They are "desperate," writes Gina Hasse of TheWashington Post. "It's a direct assault on the Democratic strategy to use the earmarking process as a way to paint Republicans as mean-spirited when it comes to spending or programs that benefit their districts." She notes the "post-election relaxation of controls" and "the absence of the need to be so confrontational on the budget process." Instead, it's

Democrats “who feel the need to use the ‘pork’ as a political shield for pork-filled spending bills that cost the country billions of dollars,” writes Roy Gutman of the Wall Street Journal. “Addressing the budget-negotiations process is completely legitimate, but by using ‘pork’ as a blunt political tool, the Democrats are serving up the kind of acrimony that has made this Congress the least productive in memory.” He also notes that this year is “fraught with potential pitfalls,” a.k.a. opportunities for Republicans. “The earmarking process makes Democrats uncomfortable, but so did members of the No Child Left Behind legislation of the last Congress,” which turned out to have “serious flaws.” In fact, the National
