Where to download the Latest Hindi Dapps Fictitious..Q: Is it possible to specify a fixed type from an autocommitted transaction in SQL Server? I have a stored procedure that executes a series of queries. The bulk of the work is done by a SQL Server transaction, but I need to use table-valued functions and user-defined types that have to be materialized. The transaction must always run (so it can't be a distributed transaction, as I don't think my sql server version is available). I found several answers about using a local temporary table, but I think that this is not the right solution, because it causes my normal table to be locked, and I don't want to run multiple transactions on the same table. How can I use table-valued functions that generate a DML error if they can't insert into the temporary table and cannot be materialized? A: You can use a table variable. It will not actually block other transactions. (Others will see it but they will not be effected) `SELECT ... INTO #Tmp EXEC sp_executesql... SELECT ... FROM #Tmp` It's a little more work than a table and the query is a little more complicated to debug. However, it's much easier to debug than using a temporary table. You can see table schema/rows, etc. I think that's the best that you can do in a standard context. A distributed transaction could work but I'm not sure if it would play well in this case. Update: SQL Server releases the memory back to the operating system when the transaction is committed. This can be a problem if you have a large number of rows in a table (in memory) and the INSERT/UPDATE/DELETE statements won't use temporary memory.
